THE WORD

“Caesar’s last breath” is an example commonly used in chemistry classrooms to explain molecular diffusion. The average human breath, including the last breath exhaled by the dying Julius Caesar, contains 1,022 molecules of air and the world as a whole contains 1,044 molecules of air. Presuming a number of things, such as a relatively even diffusion of air molecules over time, we find that at least one of the molecules of air in your lungs came from Caesar’s last breath. Presumably, therefore, there is also a 98.2 percent chance that at least one of the molecules of air in your lungs came from that breath that Christ breathed out upon the disciples in the upper room when He said, “Receive the Holy Spirit.”

Those odds are very good – but that is not the basis for our belief that we have received Christ’s Spirit. God doesn’t really leave such things to chance; the Spirit’s work, mysterious as it is, is not really like the random diffusion of molecules. We don’t have to wonder if we have a molecule of Christ’s breath in our bodies, because the Spirit of Christ has drawn us into His mystical body. As Paul reminds us in our second reading, “in one Spirit we were all baptized into one body.” All the baptized have been drawn into the body of Christ, and now live in that place where the Holy Spirit dwells, the Spirit that fills and gives life to Christ’s body.

And this body of Christ into which we have been drawn exhales us out into the world to live as Christ’s followers and so to be His witnesses.

– How do I let God breathe me into the body of Christ?
